I'm here in Stamford to enjoy some fun at the ACPT ... but I'm also playing another game during my US trip.

In 7 entries, one cell is overloaded, and does not match its crossing entry - enter each instance of overloaded text beneath its conflicting letter. The first letters, and then last letters of the corresponding clues (in clue order) reveal the name of my game.

For more specific instructions for my game plan, check the remaining clues - they each contain an extraneous word (sometimes hyphenated) to be removed before solving. In a way to be determined, they will uniquely provide an order for the instructions - follow that order for an accurate representation of the eventual results of my game. The conflicting letters, in that same order, reveal a description for my game (but not the ACPT).

Take the full name of a particularly relevant spot in the grid, replace one letter with a number (you know the one), and apply the instruction to the grid by "moving" something on the left hand side to the right. The result (if you squint) will represent the players of a different game I will witness before ACPT, whose name is found in the first letters of the extra words.

That result is also relevant to (along with my game, your game, and the "relevant spot") a two-word clue found in the last letters of the extra words, as well as its answer (when referring to the spot immediately above your grid modification). That answer, while missing from my game plan, is also: phonetically, what you've done to this puzzle, and; literally, a synonym for the description you found, and the goal of my game!
